Request is some kind of damage amp. Alcohol misuse poses a serious public health concern among college students. Our prior research demonstrated that college students who are heavy social drinkers (HSDs) perceive alcohol to be less harmful than do light social drinkers (LSDs) and non- drinkers (NLDS). These perceptions of reduced perceived harm may be related to greater willingness to drink alcohol and greater susceptibility to the "effects" of alcohol. We propose to examine psychophysiological, neurochemical, and neuroendocrine mechanisms that mediate differences between LSD and HSD responses to alcohol. Thus, we aim to identify 1) the influence of alcohol expectancies on differences in alcohol effects between HSDs and LSDs, 2) the role of potential neuroactive metabolites of alcohol on the brain's reward circuitry in HSD and LSD, 3) the influence of alcohol expectancies on acute behavioral responses to alcohol between HSDs and LSDs. These aims will be achieved using fMRI, PCIA and hormonal measures of HPA activity and stress responses. Further, we aim to determine if differences in brain regions involved in decision-making, as

PUBLIC HEALTH RELEVANCE: College students are at increased risk for alcohol misuse due to their education, socialization, and their use of psychopharmacological agents. While some college students are alcohol misusers, others are social drinkers and non-users. This study examines the individual and situational influences on the alcohol misuse behaviors of social drinkers, a population that may be at greater risk for alcohol misuse.
